The acount of the wedding is given as follows in the Examiner of the 20th, and it is certain that a great numher of friends will be on hand to greet the wedding party when they come into port. all that the most fastidious could ask. The Frye is in many ways radically different from the old-time "wind-jam mers." The crew is quartered amid hips, and not in a centined, smelly forecastle such as tradition demands that the sailorman shall occupy. The officers and passengers occupy large. airy staterooms, situated well aft-s most desirable location when there are no engines to jolt and jar the stern of the ship.

The crew's quarters are light, airy and roomy and are far less crowded than the average "bunk-house" in the cattle country.

But it is in the captain's cabin that the greatest revolution has taken place. Instead of a two-by-four Pull man berth against the wall, the skipper has a four-posted, brass, full-sized bedstead planted in the middle of the floor of a large bed room. Incidentally he has an enormous private bath coom opening out of his sleeping apart-

Not since the memorable voyage had the two men seen each other and Almy proceeded to ransack his brains for all of the nautical lore which he has no cumulated in times past, to show Murphy that he yet is entitled to be con sidered a sailor man, even though only by brevet,

The advent of Captain Murphy wa the signal for the recalling of past
